I'm trying to make a navigation list that the user can click on to go to a new route. I have this function in my vue.js code so far: async push(page) { if (typeof nav.push === 'function') { await nav.push(page) window.location.href = '#/'; } } This works fine in the browser, but if I go to localhost:8080/myPage.vue#/title it doesn't work. I need to add it as a navigation in each route. I know that I have to add this function to the top of my main.js, but how do I create a function that I can add to all of the vue routes? A: Since it's probably a shorter navigation list, I think you can use a simple vue-router computed property to hold a prop of the page URL and use with vue-router's dynamic components to do a hash navigation like so: computed: { currentPage () { return this.$route.pathname } }, components: { 'navigation': { props: { pageName: { type: String }, routerName: { type: String,

Snack clearing or snack tidy is a style of raising of the tablecloth during the meal to allow people to see their plates as they clear their food. This can be practiced in many Western cultures, but is often a part of Asian culture as well. Strategies The specific line or space that is cleared is usually between the visitors' left shoulder and right shoulder. This could be part of the dining table, or further demarcated between the flower pots on each side. Sometimes, it is between the feet of the chairs. More frequently, however, it is achieved by wiping the table (sometimes "doing the dirty work") after both the salad and the meat course. An important goal in clearing the table is to allow everyone to see his or her own plate. Although this kind of etiquette is usually practiced by all guests, the line is a marker of who has had the chance to see the plate first, and who is last. Well-mannered individuals are able to accept and even encourage the use of the "snack line" (or clear line) in socially structured dinner settings, even when other diners are not familiar with the practice. The line implies that food has been cleared, or "cleansed", before new food is served. This notion of "cleansing" food in advance of another serving is common throughout many cultures and provides a frame of reference by which new dishes can be received with respect and courtesy. In Asia Snack clearing is common in Japan. Usually in the Asian language-monocultural country, it is difficult for guests to find out what their own dishes are because the meal is usually eaten with chopsticks and other Japanese table manners, whereas in Western cultures, a "menu" of the dishes served at the table is usually made clearly visible to the table-mates before the first course. Reminding guests of their food by the tablecloth is not uncommon. Furthermore, it is also a tradition for the family members to rest after the meal if there are many guests (a simple way of showing-off their space and allure while winning compliments) and also to convey the feeling of achievement and success to the guests by giving it to the guests for their worry about the difficulty of eating on the plate. In the West, on the other hand, the table setting is used mainly for social signaling the beginning of another serving. Guests, and the hosts, use their own dishes, often containing distinct styles of presentation,
