This site looks at that history, paying particular attention to developments in recent years. The site is part of the What Does Parliament Do? series of websites, which aims to explain how Parliament works and how the UK Constitution evolved. Related projects Examining the 2007 general election On 5 May, the people of Britain went to the polls to elect a new Parliament. They were presented with a choice of two parties, Conservatives and Labour, and three issues - the economy, immigration and Europe - on which they could indicate their preference. This project will chart the campaign leading up to the election, the day itself and how the election went. Changing the rules to reform the House of Commons Britain's Parliament has been defined by two features. The first is that it is dominated by the two main parties - the Conservative and Labour parties. The second is that, since the time of Henry VIII, it has been represented by Members of Parliament who have been elected by a closed electoral system. In the 1970s and 1980s a small number of well-organised interest groups challenged these basic assumptions. By reforming the electoral system, and electing MPs by a mixed system, they hoped to establish a parliament where there would be more proportional representation of voters' views. In order to enable a genuine debate about the merits and drawbacks of the reforms, the small party groups argued that it was necessary to change the rules of the game. This is a major historical issue, because it deals with one of the two basic features of Britain's Parliament. It is also of considerable interest as many of the reforms are still alive and kicking

Friday, April 30, 2013 Fucking love collecting old ephemera, form. In this issue we have retrospectives of work made under the influence of cubism, the purist skateboard art work of the 70's, sound art explorations of the 90's, and those virus bomb geeky explosions in the late 80's. Sunday, April 25, 2013 Have a whimsical collection of retro posters, Bowie on the moon, the tiny cute books you read as a kid, the ever-so-important mix tape, school/work/hobbies based work, and of course a series of kooky action shot prints. Thursday, April 22, 2013 I embarked on a strange adventure to photograph portraits of reptiles in the Philippines. I went to the island of Cebu, which is rich with frogs, snakes, toads and lizards. The chaos, madness and colorful villages are a sight all on their own, but more importantly images of an animal I'd never seen are always pretty exciting. These images formed the core of a series of portraits called "JFwan Cola Ad Escoveit." So there you go... a picture of a junked bike and a portrait I made with a green tabletop. Monday, April 19, 2013 I was in San Diego at the time and decided to wear my favorite shirt that a friend gave me, which was the one where the sleeves of the shirt are wide enough to cover a person's arm. A good thing to wear on a hot day for sure. While riding my bicycle down the street, I came across a child who had a backpack full of what I at first thought were sandals, but which upon examination, turned out to be sandals made out of plastic bottles. They were pretty beautiful to me and reminded me of that day there were so many plastic bottle recycling "bumps" in the ground that I had to take a step to see where I was going, and the subsequent four months of winter just didn't look the same. So I took a photo and sent it to a friend of mine who also works in this area, and made this story out of it. Saturday, April 17, 2013 I photographed and interviewed this guy, Abz, in the Angeles National Forest in Los Angeles, CA. I was photographing people in the woods that hadn't seen a human in a while, people naked. That kind of thing. I thought he
