SQLite XML Editor Screenshots:Quest IT Fertility Blog Thursday, May 7, 2013 Along with the technical skills needed to evaluate and repair a network, engineers should also be comfortable writing and debugging their own code. This greatly reduces the chance of falling behind on hardware troubleshooting, because the IP address of the device where the problem is happening will automatically become clear. This diagram is an oversimplification of the key networking and internet protocols, and it leaves out many complexity you'd usually expect in a network. For example, if the device is on the same local subnet as the router, you should probably be able to find it by name. You should never ever reach into the nearest switch and plug in your wire directly to the IP address of the device. First, you should be sure that it isn't plugged into the same jack. Second, it should be plugged into a port that is part of the same switch. Third, the device should be enabled before trying to reach its internet address (through DHCP). He won't see any of the bad code he has written. It will either continue functioning, silently, or it will fail to function at all. If the latter, she'll get a more explicit (and, hopefully, helpful) error message. If the former, well, she will have to live with the program's gray areas of unpredictability, which is the same as any other program out there. Why it's worth it to debug this code is another matter. If you want her to function optimally, you'll need to track down the source of the problem.
