Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a navigation system, and more particularly, to a navigation system for sensing a vehicle's location using a Global Positioning System (GPS) receiver and a terrestrial magnetism sensor. 2. Description of the Related Art A navigation system typically includes a microcomputer with a Global Positioning System (GPS) receiver, a vehicle speed sensor and a map database. The GPS receiver receives radio waves from a constellation of a number of GPS satellites, and determines from the received radio waves the present location of the navigation system. The vehicle speed sensor, usually a mechanical speed sensor, detects the number of revolutions of a vehicle's wheels. The map database stores data of the present location of roads in accordance with road data. When a vehicle is traveling along a road, the navigation system determines the road data with the detected vehicle speed and road conditions of the road, such as the number of lane ways, by referring to the map database. The microcomputer determines the present location of the vehicle in the vicinity of the road in accordance with the road data. The navigation system then informs a driver of the present location of the vehicle. The terrestrial magnetism sensor detects the terrestrial magnetism around the vehicle. The change in the terrestrial magnetism is caused by the vehicle's motion, thereby determining whether the vehicle is traveling along the road or not. The navigation system judges whether the vehicle is traveling on the road or not by comparing the vehicle's location with the road data while detecting the change of the terrestrial magnetism. The conventional navigation system determines the vehicle's location at random while detecting the change of the terrestrial magnetism, thereby having the problems in that the delay in the determination of the vehicle's location is increased and the sensitivity to noise is lowered.
