It was intended to demonstrate the skills of analysis, synthesis and evaluation in the acquisition of knowledge, as well as my thesis topic. I actually started it a few days before I wrote to the office from Lancaster, and it was finished just before I moved to London, and there it sat, until the summer of 2010. It was my first attempt at a research project, and I've always been rather proud of the fact that I had carried it through. Back in October last year, one of my former colleagues asked me what the topic was, and I told her what it was about. She approached the editor of the magazine and asked if I would like to submit it to them. They initially told me that there was no space in their November edition, but they very kindly agreed to take it in the May 2011 edition. The one thing I was really nervous about was that it would never get published. Well, it has been accepted. So, I decided to start writing it up, after a very long time since I wrote to the office. Over the holidays, I found that I had started writing it, and it was proving to be very enjoyable to put together. I was also glad that I'd got back to it. My original intention was for this to be the first of several. The project was divided into ten papers, which I would have loved to have had more time to complete. However, writing to editors and the editorial office is tiring for someone who is busy raising a child, and it was a challenge to find out how best to do this. Ultimately, I
